Samoa is a country of great natural beauty and has, over a millennia, evolved a rich and distinguished culture. The mainstay of this culture and the profusion of expressions emanating from it, is the natural environment. Samoans had a kinship relationship with the contingent world, living in harmony with the natural resources that provided for their wellbeing. The discovery and use of natural fibres supplied the building blocks that sustained the Samoan way of life. Inquisitive and intelligent, early settlers in the island archipelago adapted the knowledge they brought with them with succeeding generations refining and building on that knowledge with new and innovative uses. This short film explores the use of natural fibres in Samoa and its importance to life and culture in the islands. It has a particular emphasis on the making and use of 'afa' or coconut sennit and is the second in a series of films exploring the inspired wealth of this remarkable tree. Total running time: 17 minutes

Su'e and Tui are twins but that is where their similarities end. Su'e wants to be someone but Tui is more interested in helping a local street gang turn into a choir to win prize money for charity. Their mother, Malia, recalls her Grandfather's ancient Samoan stories of the Tui brothers, Sina and the evil Sauali'i. A battle between Granpa and Sauali'i is declared over Su'e but there can only be one winner. Who will be left standing? This play is the third play in the series.

The play begins with a retelling of the ancient Samoan tragic love story of Vaea and Apaula and the sacred steps that are learnt from the story. It is Tigilau's Grenpa who initially tells the story in wanting to share the story with his own grandson to then pass onto next generations. However, it is Ofisa, Tigilau's cousin, who is under pressure from his father to do well in school who also needs to hear and heed the story. This play is the fourth play in the Pasifika play series of Maui and Sina; Tagaloalagi; and Su'e the lost son.

Maui and Sina are ancient mythological figures in Maori and Pasifika legends that have been brought to life for new generations in this play. The play spans oral tradition as if follows the origins of Papa, Rangi and their children to new lands. It then spans the epic journey of the traditional Siakisone family coming to terms with new values and religious ideas from afar. When Maui meets Sina their relationship cannot continue as Maui's family immigrates to the new land of New Zealand. They meet again in New Zealand under tragic circumstances as the family bears the hardship of losing a family member through the values of the new society. This play is the first in a series.
