Two decades before the Ottoman conquest of Constantinople, Manuel, a young Greek boy, is conscripted by the Ottomans from his Thracian village. He is given the name Ibrahim, converts to Islam, and becomes a member of the elite Ottoman military corps, the Janissaries. His loyalty sworn to the Sultan, Ibrahim fights alongside his fellow Janissaries for control of the Balkans; meanwhile, their sights are always set on the Red Apple, the glittering jewel that is Constantinople. But amidst the carnage of war and political maneuverings between rival factions loyal to the Prince and the Grand Vizier, Ibrahim begins to question the Janissary life of battle and bloodshed, instead falling in love with the beautiful peasant girl Mihrimah. Will he uphold his duty to the Sultan and the quest for Constantinople or follow his heart to his own Red Apple? Even if he pursues his dream, it seems old enmities may make his happiness illusory.....

We may no longer be talking to a sibling, yet there's no escaping the relationship. We are bound by it. We have no choice about the family we are born into, unlike our friendships, which we are free to make and unmake. But like it or not, we have a primordial need to belong. The writer Iris Murdoch said it so succinctly: "There is no substitute for the comfort supplied by the utterly taken-for-granted relationship."

Has its close connection with academe enriched or diminished Philippine literature in English? Are there alternatives to academe as literary arbiters? Is Latin American fiction the source of Philippine marvelous realism, or are our own novelists in English mining a more powerful, native lode? How do contemporary Filipino women writers "perform" the modern wonder tale? How do women's memoirs and travel essays function as social history? Are literary blogs part of a long tradition of chronicling or are they breaking new ground?

These are some of the questions that Cristina Pantoja Hidalgo asks in her latest, and perhaps most provocative, book. The answers she offers rely on her long years of experience as both writer of fiction and creative nonfiction, and a teacher of literature.

This book will interest literature specialists, literary practitioners, and ordinary readers who enjoy reading books by Filipino writers.

Fatimah's Kampung / Iain Buchanan
Penang : Consumers Association of Penang, 2008
120p,; 21 by 30cm
ISBN-13: 9789833083701
$ 35.00

Fatimah's kampung was the last kampong the city consumed. It was a small kampong, which Fatimah's moyang had begun when he built a house from the forest. Nearby was the keramat, with its doves and its sacred tree. And on the hill was the last patch of forest, where great rattans grew and tigers hid.

For generations, the keramat had kept the kampong and its forest safe from Development. Everywhere else, villages had been flattened, precious landmarks destroyed. But Fatimah had been blessed: she still lived in the house her moyang had built, and she could still hear the banana leaves clatter in the rain outside her window. She could explore the keramat, talk to the doves ... and still walk in the shade of ancient trees.

Then Development came. The forest was cut down, the kampong demolished, and a great factory went up. But it was not the end of the house that Fatimah's moyang had built. And it was not the end for the doves in the keramat, when their home too was finally flattened ... or for the tiger that had haunted Fatimah's thoughts for so long.

Fatimah's story is a parable, for children and adults, about a fast-changing world. It is a reminder of how wonderful the world can be, and a warning of how barren we can let it become.

This book looks into some highlights of Chinese poetics from a historical and transcultural perspective. It carries out an in-depth discussion of such thematic topics as Confucius' expectation of poetry in education, Mozi and Xunzi on musical functions, Liu Xie's critical illumination of poetic styles, Zhu Xi's moralistic view of poetry, the poetic wisdom in the zen enlightenment, Wang Guowei's aesthetic criticism of the poetic state par excellence, and Lu Xun's sublime poetics of maratic type. All this is conducted through textual and contextual analysis in order to facilitate a new rediscovery and creative synthesis.
