To this day plantations play an important role in the economy of many countries in the world. However international finance crisis, basic changes in the economic and politics during the last few decades have relatively reshaped the trade relationship between the consumers and producers. This has influenced many implications of the plantation industry.

This study aims to facilitate an initial understanding of the situation and issues confronting tea plantation workers in Sri Lanka. On the basis of the information, the study explores the status of the health & education, freedom from poverty, living wage, conditions of employment, struggle of plantation women workers and the role of the stakeholders in the development of the plantation community.

There is no doubt that the plantation sector will retain its importance in the economy in the future as well, which will largely depend on the sustenance of the workers. We believe that the challenges of the plantation people can be effectively overcome, and a mechanism developed.

From 2002, Cambodia underwent a dramatic economic transformation driven mainly by external factors. This involved the disappearance of forests and the decline of logging, the inflow of Chinese investment and the rise of indigenous capital, and the increased significance of remittances from garment workers and labour migrants. The impact of government policies on land registration and concessions transformed relations of production and, with them, the socio-economic and political environment. This book examines the political economy of the Cambodian boom, analysing the changing structure of the economy, the relationship between state and market, and outcomes for the poor. It situates Cambodian experience within key debates on the political economy of Eastern Asia, scrutinizing the relationship between class formation, governance and resource distribution.

The primer of Cambodia starts by describing agriculture and its significant contributions in boosting the country's overall economy. It features the primary agricultural commodities produced for the import and export market and shows market trends. Government interventions and policy reforms that have had a profound impact on development efforts are also discussed. The last two sections of the primer deal with important facets, namely, public investment and research and development, which if addressed judiciously, have the potential to boost agriculture.

International labour migration can be characterized in three ways — as human aspiration, tradition, and necessity. For some people, working overseas is a dream. For others, international labour mobility is a tradition. For a great number of people, however, international labour migration is an economic necessity. It is the only viable solution to realize their basic human right to a decent life. GMS worker movements to Thailand typify all three characterizations of international labour mobility. While this book focuses on the economic dimensions of international labour emigration, principally from Cambodia, Laos and Vietnam to Thailand, it recognizes at the very outset the equal standing of non-economic motivations for migration

Urbanization occurs in tandem with development. Countries in Southeast Asia need to build — individually and collectively — the capacity of their cities and towns to promote economic growth and development, to make urban development more sustainable, to mitigate and adapt to climate change, and to ensure that all groups in society share in the development. This book is a result of a series of regional discussions by experts and practitioners involved in the urban development and planning of their countries. It highlights urbanization issues that have implications for regional — including ASEAN — cooperation, and provides practical recommendations for policymakers. It is a first step towards assisting governments in the region to take advantage of existing collaborative partnerships to address the urban transformation that Southeast Asia is experiencing today.
