Baobab Trails / Clive Walker

Jacana Media, South Africa 2013

314p.;

9781431408672

$ 32.00 / HB

Clive's contact with baobab trees and their presence, combined with his desire to retrace his steps, as well as record and capture these remarkable trees, their size, human history and his own adventures upon first encountering them, means that these remarkable trees are woven into his autobiography, with the skilful assistance of Sally Antrobus.

Clive's journey covers a large spectrum of the southern African landscape – an amazing 45 000 km – and identifies and records forty trees through photos and art. For Clive Walker, these forty trees represent the 40th anniversary of the founding of the Endangered Wildlife Trust.

Clive Walker's career has seen him as a game ranger, writer, and a leading force in environmental education and conservation. As a wildlife artist he has used his art to raise tens of thousands of rands for conservation projects.

Transforming the Frontier : Peace parks and the politics of neoliberal conservation in Southern Africa / B Buscher

UCT Press, South Africa 2013

320p.

9781775820673

$ 39.50 / PB

In Transforming the Frontier Bram Buscher questions why peace parks — large areas that protect biodiversity while stimulating international development through ecotourism — have become such a popular conservation model. Drawing from extensive fieldwork in the Maloti-Drakensberg Transfrontier Conservation and Development Project (MDTP), Buscher looks at the reasons and ways transfrontier conservation has been touted as a global solution. While frontier politics previously focused on ecological preservation, Buscher claims that the discourse has drastically shifted away from preservation, and instead transfrontier conservation has become an integral mechanism of neoliberal political economies. Moreover, Buscher argues that the grandiose diplomatic presumptions of peace park initiatives and community-based conservation efforts fail to take into account the limited resources and leadership of local groups, as well as the complexities of everyday life that inhibit the implementation of this 'global solution'.
